PARASITES ON THE FLY .- A singular microscopical discovery, which may prove highly important in a sanitary point of view, has been made by Thomas Taylor, M. D., of this city, microscopist of the Department of Agriculture. About a year ago while dissecting out the proboscis of a common house fly Dr. Taylor discovered minute snake-like animals moving quickly from the proboscis. Continuing his experiments from time to time since then, he finds that house flies are very frequently inhabited by these animals. He has found them generally in the proboscis of the fly, though sometimes they are found in the abdomen. He thinks that since flies are carriers of these minute snake-like animals they may in like manner be conveyers of contagious germs—much smaller bodies. These animals measure about eight onehundredths to one-tenth of an inch in length, and about one-thousandths of an inch in diameter. They are classed under the Nematoidae, genus Anquillula. They are much larger than trichine or so-called vinegar eels. Mr. Taylor has found as many as seven of these animals in the proboscis of one fly and three more in the abdomenten in all. Sometimes none are discovered. sometimes one only, but frequently four are seen. Their presence is usually indicated by a rolling movement in the anterior portion of the proboscis. When this is observed, if a drop of water be placed upon it the animals will readily leave the proboscis and take to the water. They are frequently observed passing in and out of the proboscis, to and from the water, as if the proboscis was their natural home. A power of twenty-five diameters is sufficient to observe their general movements, but for examinations of their structure from 250 to 500 diameters is necessary. They are perceptible to the naked eye in certain light. Mr. Taylor proposes to make the experiment of feeding flies on tri-chinosed meat to test the possibility of trichinæ or the eggs of trichinæ being taken up by flies. These experiments may lead to very useful results in a sanitary point of view .- Wash. Star.
